MISS HENRIETTA ROSENBLATT RETIRES

WASHINGTON, D.C.--Miss Henrietta Rosenblatt of Connecticut Avenue has retired from the Office of Business Affairs of The George Washington University after 33 years with the university.

At the time of her retirement, Miss Rosenblatt was executive assistant to the director of business affairs. She came to the university in 1943 as the purchasing assistant for the university in the Business Office. Over the years she served in positions of increasing responsibility under five different business managers. She had a major part in the preparations for convocations and in arranging classroom assignments. Friends and associates at the university honored her at a reception on June 25.

GWU INITIATES NEW MASTER'S PROGRAM IN MUSEUM STUDIES

WASHINGTON, D.C.--Beginning in September the Graduate School of Arts and Sciences at The George Washington University will offer a new interdisciplinary, master's program in museum studies.

The program is designed to prepare students for museum careers and it offers a broad background in museum studies as well as specializations in conservation, collections management, and exhibition techniques. In addition, the program includes extensive graduate study in a core discipline--such as anthropology, American studies, art history, and biology.

A museum internship is an integral part of the program and students may intern in any one of a number of Washington-area museums which house a wide range of specialized collections. The program's course work in conservation is taught in the world-famous conservation laboratories of the Smithsonian Institution.

The master's degree in museum studies requires a minimum of 42 hours of course work: at least 15 in the museum field, 6 to 12 in the museum internship, and the remainder in one or more academic disciplines.

For further information about GWU's master's in museum studies write or call Dr. Avery D. Andrews, Assistant Dean, Graduate School of Arts and Sciences, The George Washington University, Washington, D.C. 20052, (202) 676-6210.

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

WASHINGTON, D.C. -- The George Washington University will preserve the 1840s-vintage townhouse that stands on the site of a proposed World Bank office building by moving it to another location on the campus, University Vice President and Treasurer Charles E. Diehl announced today.

The plan to relocate the house, which is owned by the university and leased to the 1925 F Street Club, is included in a rezoning and planned unit development application --to be filed today with the Zoning Commission of the District of Columbia--for construction of an office building for the World Bank within the block bounded by 19th, 20th, F and G Streets, Northwest.

Mr. Diehl said the university's decision to move the house one block and use it for academic offices was made after "an architectural feasibility study determined that the 130-odd-year-old house could be transported without sustaining significant structural damage."

The university plans to move the original three-story structure built in the 1840s by Georgetown businessman Alexander Ray from 1925 F Street to a vacant landscaped lot at 610 21st Street, a residential block within the campus. Later additions to the rear of the house will not be relocated. The club's lease expires October 31, 1976.

The preservation of the Ray House brings to three the number of landmark structures that the university will save or enhance as part of the planned unit development it proposes for the block that is to be rezoned. The T-shaped structure for the World Bank will be built around two adjoining 1800-vintage townhouses, which will remain in the 600 block of 19th Street. The Concordia United Church of Christ also will stay at the corner of 20th and G Streets.

The two houses on 19th Street were originally owned by John Lenthall, superintendent of construction of the U.S. Capitol, and appear on the National Register of Historic Places as Category II landmarks. The Ray House is not on the National Register, but is listed as a Category II landmark in the District of Columbia Register.

The architectural team of Vlastimil Koubek, Pietro Belluschi and Hideo Sasaki, who will design the World Bank building, will incorporate the Lenthall houses into a landscaped setting adjoining the proposed landscaped promenade at the corner of 19th and G Streets. This will facilitate access to the building for employees from the main Bank buildings, located diagonally across the street. The staff of the International Monetary Fund, which has close working relations with the Bank, occupies the building to the north.

The Lenthall house at 614 19th Street is owned by the university. The adjoining house at 612 is privately owned. The Concordia Church, which also is not a university holding, is concurrently filing an application for rezoning and a planned unit development for its property within the block. Immediate plans call for the continued use of this property as a church.

"This whole block lies within the path of orderly development for office use which converges in the square from the north, east, and south," Mr. Diehl explained. "The logical long-term use for this site is for office space."

Construction of an office building on the proposed site is consistent with the university's 1970 master plan, which calls for high-density commercial development along major thoroughfares, including Pennsylvania Avenue and 19th Street.

Immediate plans call for the continued use of this property as a church.

"This whole block lies within the path of orderly development for office use which converges in the square from the north, east, and south," Mr. Diehl explained. "The logical long-term use for this site is for office space."

Construction of an office building on the proposed site is consistent with the university's 1970 master plan, which calls for high-density commercial development along major thoroughfares, including Pennsylvania Avenue and 19th Street.

The plan was approved by both the National Capital Planning Commission and the District of Columbia Board of Zoning Adjustment. The development of this property is part of an overall, balanced university financial program, Mr. Diehl said.

Negotiations between the university and the Bank are expected to be completed by the end of the year.

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

GWU TO OFFER NEW MASTER'S DEGREE IN HUMAN RESOURCE STUDIES

WASHINGTON, D.C.--Beginning this September The George Washington University will offer a new master of science degree with a concentration in human resource studies. The faculty coordinator will be Professor Sar Levitan, widely-known Washington economist.

The program has been designed to provide practitioners in employment and training with realistic, interdisciplinary approaches to manpower issues and the skill to analyze problems in employment and human resource development. The program will be especially concerned with exploring new solutions and innovations where traditional theories and earlier techniques have proven inadequate.

This new master's degree is a special interdisciplinary course of study designed for professionals pursuing careers in employment policy, employee development, and human resource management. Courses will be scheduled to meet on two weekends each month, Friday evening (6:30 to 9 p.m.) and all day Saturday (9-12 a.m. and 1-4 p.m.), over a two-year period. They will be taught by members of the faculty at GWU and by visiting lecturers from other universities and the government. Student advisors will be GWU faculty members.

The program of study consists of 12 three-credit courses. Courses will be structured to allow some individual specialization and independent study. Students who have creditable professional experience equivalent to specific program requirements, may, with the approval of an advisor, enroll in alternate graduate courses offered in the regular evening schedule at the university.

Courses will be offered in human resource policy; sociology of work and organizations; methods in economic statistics; human resource development; survey of economics; advanced administrative management; policy analysis in public administration; labor economics; career development and information; income distribution; current issues in unionism, collective bargaining and labor relations; and methods in social policy research.

All applicants to the program must have a bachelor's degree from an accredited college or university and a B average for academic work. Applications are being accepted now for the fall semester.

The fee per course will be $294.00 which includes the cost of texts. A deferred payment plan may be arranged.

Classes will be held on the GWU campus. Parking is available in the university garage.

A meeting for prospective students will be held on Friday, August 20 from 6 to 7:30 p.m. in room 410 of GW's Marvin Center, 21st and H Sts. N.W. To register for this meeting call 676-7028.

For application forms and further details write to the Graduate School of Arts and Sciences, GWU, Washington, D.C. 20052 or call the university representative, Harvey Snyder, at the College of General Studies at 676-7028.
